You start out by learning how to use those ten fingers over ten keys, and with lots of practice, you extend the rules to include more and more keys. It requires the correct posture while sitting before the piano, sitting on a stool or chair of the right height, and positioning the fingers so that the fingertips can touch and depress the notes fully.

Action stations. The action describes how easy or hard the keys are to actually press down to produce a note. Real pianos have weighted keys and therefore quite a heavy action, so for beginners a more lightly-sprung 'synth action' keyboard is more likely to fit the bill to start with. A light action is often better for small hands in particular, but don't be too tempted by mini-size keys
